DECLASSIFIED

THURSDAY
DECEMBER 10, 1953

After a stop at Shannon, where we consumed a hasty but excellent breakfast of delicious Irish bacon and eggs and bought a few Irish woolen handmade covers, we came on to Paris, arriving at Orly just 13 hours after taking off from New York.

I went to the office this afternoon.

Harold Callender called on me.

I transacted current business and rode home in the new Studebaker, which has been painted dark green during my absence. It is a sporty-looking car but the space between the front and back seats is so narrow as to make entry difficult for anyone except a gymnast.
